OF THE MANY YUKON COMPANIES and Yukon First Nation-partnered businesses working on site to construct Victoria’s Eagle Gold Project, only one can lay claim to having built an air strip in Antarctica; 1600 kilometres south of South America’s Cape Horn.

Pelly Construction Ltd. (Pelly) is constructing the future mine’s primary and secondary crusher sites, 90-day ore storage pad, heap leach embankment, access roads and event and control ponds. Of the 400-plus workers on site, 75 of Pelly’s 145 employees assigned to the Project are at Eagle at a time.

Early on in Victoria’s planning process, the company expressed its desire to deal with as many local people and companies as possible and practical.

“Our team has gathered a wealth of experience working in remote and cold weather conditions when it comes to infrastructure development and construction,” says Jennifer Byram, Pelly VP. “We are so proud of our employees and the expertise they bring to our work with Victoria to help advance the Eagle Gold Project.”

Beyond the company’s professional reputation and expertise, like Victoria Gold, Pelly has become a household name in the Yukon through its continued commitment to local charities, sports teams, events and literacy and educational initiatives.

Pelly also has a long history of mutually respectful and successful working relationships with Yukon First Nations built upon agreements that benefit Pelly and First Nation citizens.

“Victoria is extremely proud of our employees, contractors, partnerships and communities. From the region’s rich mining past we look forward to a golden, and promising future.” John McConnell, President and CEO Victoria Gold Corp.

Pelly was eager to take a part in the Project and had enough capacity and extensive mine development experience to secure a significant portion of the work. As well as providing a competitive offer, Pelly brings many years of similar experience to the table. Pelly has succeeded at hundreds of projects in the north, is familiar with the local work force and has an excellent reputation with local suppliers.
